Excerpt: .sits upon a bad return, to keep his seat, in spite of a well-grounded petition and a trial by a committee chosen by ballot: but may not the thing be achieved by a man of true vigilance, insinuation, and delicate artifice? Let no, man, having before him an object of such consequence as a seat in parliament and the discharge of the legislative functions, hesitate to put in practice the necessary arts. Since his ultimate objectis so great and good, it cannot be his duty to bnggle about the means. Get into.the house, fairly if you can; but, at all rates, get into the house; a Once in the house, suffer neither Heaven nor Hell to exclude you from it! On the other hand, the motives to petition against a return, are natural and strong. Is a candidate to give up his cause, even after the trouble and expense of an election, as long as, he can indulge the smallest hope of prosecuting it to full success? Are voters to suffer the loss of their power and rights, by too tainely yielding to the ascendancy of a rival party 3 Never. Petition, then, against any election of which the issue disappoints your hopes, if there be the smallest probability of your so petitioning with effect . Pursue your petition with spirit and address, to an ultimate trial of the merits of the election. Leave no act untried, no stone unturned, to gain the victory....
