Urge me not hence from the silent night, To the glittering dance in the festive hall, For here is a canopy stately and bright, And lovelier far than the carved wall. I would not flaunt in the gorgeous throng, For the heart that I sigh for beateth not there, And how could I smile at the flowing song, When my breast for another was wasting with care The forest leaves in the passing wind As it floats thro the glade to the rivers shrine, A music more apt to the weary mind, Than the warbling of thousands, tho all but divine. AN EVENING RAMBLE. How sweet to wander oer the flowery mead, Where the pale cowslip lifts its sickly head, Where boyhood wanderd, and where youthful care Was all forgotten when each friend was there! Ah! happy days, which time hath...
