Excerpt from English Writers, Vol. 6: An Attempt Towards a History of English Literature; From Chaucer to Caxton The safe-conduct of the 13th of August, 1357, was granted by King Edward, ad supplicationem David de Bruys - that is to say, at the desire of David II., King of Scotland. This David was the only son of Robert Bruce. He was about five years old when his father died, and had been married in the preceding year to a child of like age Joanna, sister to the King Of England. Scotland was governed during the minority of David II. By Regents, of whom the first was Randolph Earl of Moray, Regent until his death in 1332. Then followed, as Regent, Bruce s nephew, Donald Earl of Mar. Donald was routed and slain by Edward, son of John Baliol. Baliol was crowned at Scone, and quickly driven out of Scotland, Archibald Douglas having become Regent. But Edward Baliol returned with forces of King Edward III., and on the 20th of July, 1333, Archibald Douglas and the Scots were defeated at Halidon Hill. Edward Baliol,...
