Around the World without a Cent By Henry Spickler Excerpt IT was somewhere in the Wicklow Mountains on the coast-road between Dublin and Cork. The hour was noon, the day cold and wet. My only lunch was a half loaf of bread strapped to the wheel, which I leaned against a sod fence, and on the easy hospitality of the Island, was admitted into an Irish womans cottage. I had paid a certain definite respect to the other inmate of the house a long razor-back sow that came out as I went in. For some pictures which I carried I wished to obtain some bacon, a kindness never failing among the Irish, no matter how poor they might be, little thinking that the sow had also the same pain of hunger and was so soon to satisfy it at my expense. From Ameriky! said she, when I told her of my mission, whare yez hiv ivrything to ate and dhrink, and yez come over here to stharve! I had been listening and looking. The small chunk of peat lay on the open fire-place, smoking, but as usual not giving...
