Excerpt from Proceedings of the Twentieth Oilseed Processing Clinic: Held at New Orleans, La., February 4 and 5, 1971 Since the future of the cottonseed industry is largely in? uenced by the future of the cotton crop, it seems appropriate to take a brief look at a major change in cotton production. High-population cotton, known in some areas as close-grown or narrow-row cotton, has received a vast amount of publicity. The major objective of this production system is, of course, to reduce the cost of producing a pound of cotton by decreasing irrigation, pesticide, har vesting, and other costs. Numerous high population trial plantings have been made across the Cotton Belt with varying degrees of success. New types of pickers and strippers designed for high-population cotton are being perfected and marketed. New, early maturing varieties of cotton are in various stages of development, and some present-day varieties may be satisfactory.
