Ned was to leave them on the next day, and even he had been rather touched by the care and anxiety his poor father had shown that he should be sent off with everything comfortable; especially after his conduct at Mr. Clark s, which, as Ned was now beginning in some degree to acknowledge, had not been by any means good or satisfactory. Poor unstable Ned! He had been talked to by the clergyman and by Joseph Clark, and between them they had produced some slight impression; and Nelly had also a little influenced him. But would it last? Who was there to guide him aright or give him good advice in Cherriton? These thoughts were passing through the minds of Nelly and her father, and for some minutes they had not spoken. Ned was pretending to occupy himself with a book, but...
