There is a widespread conviction that the results of our schooling are painfully disproportionate to what is expected of it and to the tremendous amount of energy put into the cause. In many localities and institutions no expense of money, energy and sincerity of purpose have been spared, yet no appreciable improvement has been made. Unquestionably something must be fundamentally and radically wrong. Naturally, suspicion has often turned upon the teaching staff - upon the honesty and integrity of their purposes and upon the efficiency of the administrative machinery. But those most intimately acquainted with facts have generally become very thoroughly convinced, that aside from sporadic instances, the fidelity of operators of the school system is its strongest asset. In the most recent years the cry has gone up that...
