Waitey McColl is a young adult working as the night clerk of the Sequoyah House hotel, in the Cherokee Badlands of eastern Oklahoma. A Native American of mixed blood, he was born in the Cherokee Nation of Indian Territory, a few years before the region became the 46th state of Oklahoma in 1907. He is smart and ambitious; and, as a direct descendant of riders on the Cherokee Trail of Tears - a pejorative among Native Americans describing the forcible removal of ancestors from the United States - he harbors a deep resentment toward the white society. The angst of his ancestors has been passed down through generations to him. During a fierce winter storm in the town of Seymour, where the respectable hotel is located, the notorious outlaw Henry Starr appears like a specter from the past. Although he spent several years on the FBI's most wanted lists, he has been on parole for five years and out of public view. Waitey considers him the last of the really bad actors, such as Jessie and Frank James, the Daltons, Quantrill, Cole Younger and others, who fled to the Cherokee Badlands to escape federal law officers and justice. On the stormy night visit, Henry Starr introduces himself to Waitey as a cousin and a wolf clansman, and coerces the intimidated night clerk into providing lodging for him and his gang. They are traveling in a snazzy Stutz Bearcat automobile, a zeitgeist of the Roaring Twenties. They leave at dawn, as Henry Starr promised, but Waitey's troubles are far from over. He becomes embroiled in a police manhunt for the gang, after they rob a bank in a...
