On a certain morning that spring Frank lisped Master Arthurs name, eating his breakfast out of the new mug which Miss Evy had sent him. This mug had arrived in a box with various other articles sent from Ardnamona to the Castle. It had a picture of the Ulstermans patron saint, King William on his white horse, upon it; and McPherson was suspected of grudging it to his little grandson, and of wishing to have it to ornament his own pantry. Frank had plenty of milk now, for the cow had lately calved. Mammy, said he, Master Arthurs coming to gie us a hand wi the praties. He is, son: God bless the handsome face of him. The gentlemens all coming as soon as breakfasts over, said Willy. Master John said last night, If you canna get men to set the praties, well be your men, says he, an well no ax wages, says he. Sure wee Cecil sat for a good piece of a morning in this kitchen helping Dan to wale the praties, said his mother, in a tone of heartfelt admiration. Ay, said the father, an he done it as manly an clever as I could dot mysel. Have you any more of the stirabout, Mary Im ready for my meat the day. Mrs. McPhersons stirabout was made of meal that had come to the Castle with the landlords own stores. No one...
