FBC LTD, 2018. Paperback. Condition: New. Language: English . Brand New Book  Print on Demand . Excerpt from Improvement of the Mississippi River: May 3, 1878 This river system, considered as a whole, extends from north to south, from one climate to another. Nature has provided that different climates shall furnish different products, and it is but in accordance with those designs and sound principles of political economy that the chief commercial exchanges of the United States should be in the same direction. In America, at least, those principles of trade have been disregarded, and the exchanges have been too much on parallels of latitude. But, regardless of what has been the practice, it is a fact which cannot be gainsaid, that the most important trade for the United States to secure is that of the nations lying south of us, and within easy reach of the Mississippi Valley. Of the valley itself it may be said that the northern and southern portions are, in climate, resources, and products, the supplement of each other. Of the valley, and the Spanish-American nations, it may be said that one is, in climate, products, resources, supply, and demand, the complement of the other. The Mississippi River furnishes facilities for exchanges on that principle, and is, therefore, economically correct. True public economy requires that such laws of nature and trade be not disregarded. Again, this highway is in accordance with the rule of political economy as well as common sense, which is that channels of commerce be located in regions which are sufficiently fertile and settled to furnish products for transportation. The most productive portions of the United States are the rich valleys extending up and down the Mississippi and its many tributaries. The highway was located where...
