It is one of the best books. Indeed, it really is a play, nevertheless an amazing and interesting literature. It is extremely difficult to leave it before concluding, once you begin to read the book.

Excerpt from Lives of Eminent Literary and Scientific Men of America Much is said about the development of a purely national literature, but we confess that we have little expectation of realizing its speedy accomplishment. So long as England and America speak the same language, and so long as the human mind is progressive in each, so long will they possess a literature in common, and whether willing to admit the truth or not, so long will they derive mutual advantage from the labors of either. And why should it not be thus? The gentle strains of Wordsworth fall as sweetly upon the ear from the quiet banks of the Delaware, as amid the mountains and lakes of his own Westmoreland, and Longfellow's Voices of the Night breathe as melodious and plaintive a tone, when echoed along the cliffs of Devon, as from the rock-bound shores of New England. Literature is the reflex of society. It does not fashion, but is fashioned by it, - it is the consequence and not the cause. Its materials are developed, its forms moulded, and its authors supplied from its ample resources, to which it gives a coloring in return. Occasionally some transcendent genius bursts upon the world in advance of his time, and lives neglected by his own, to be worshipped by succeeding ages; but this is an exception, not an example. The literature of a country is usually the fairest criterion of its tastes, opinions, character and refinement, and judged by this standard, the hasty observer might question the advances of American society, because he sees nothing in its literature materially differing from that of the English. Now this only proves the...
