THE EU AND ITS BALKAN ENTANGLEMENTS

GRIN Verlag. Paperback. Condition: New. 32 pages. Dimensions: 8.5in. x 5.5in. x 0.1in. Essay from the year 2006 in the subject Politics - International Politics - Topic: European Union, grade: -, London School of Economics (Department of International Relations), language: English, abstract: The Balkan wars of the 1990s and NATO's military intervention in Kosovo at the end of the past decade can be seen as two major catalysts which have triggered various readjustments within the EU's system of foreign policy-making. Materially, the EU has been forced to reshape its relations with the countries of South-Eastern Europe, but it has also adapted its post-Cold War foreign policy tools more generally. In terms of overall political strategies, the adoption of new security doctrines (such as the Petersberg tasks) and the implementation of peace-building initiatives for the Western Balkans (such as the Stability Pact for South-Eastern Europe or the joint police mission in Bosnia-Herzegovina) have been widely acknowledged as both internal and external successes for the EU. Institutionally, the member states have demonstrated a commitment to reinforce their visibility and influence in world politics by establishing the position of a High Representative for the CFSP, a Political and Security Committee (PSC) and a Policy Planning and Early Warning Unit. It was also recognised that restricting CFSP to an ad hoc arrangement of informal or reactive policies would not be sufficient if the EU's declared ambition to become a significant international actor was to be taken seriously. Still, it might well be argued that CFSP experienced a considerable boost only after other actors had criticised the EU's seeming complacency and self-limitation to the role of a paymaster in international security affairs. Partly as a reaction to the mistakes made between 1991 and 1995, a specifically European approach to preventing and managing security crises appears to have...
