Excerpt from The Dublin Review, Vol. 10: July October, 1883 Common sense would seem to say, that the fact of intelligent and cultivated men who are earnest, practical Catholics being divided as to their political partisanship, was by itself enough to prove that a great deal may be said for either course of political action, and that neither can be inconsistent with Catholic principles. Nevertheless, it is often confidently asserted that the Church is essentially Conservative and before the last general election certain writers did not shrink from declaring that no Catholic could consistently vote against the Conservative party. Other writers would persuade us that the cause of God's poor - as the cause of true charity - can only be promoted in the political arena by supporting the policy of the party now in office.
