Their justification, it is claimed, is in the training and not in the material product, though even it can be far from worthless. Further, it is said that wood and metal make lack of precision evident and that the work stands as its own judge. This is true in some degree of all work. If it is more true of wood than of the other materials under discussion, does it not then require less ability to judge on the part of the workman? If this is a fact, certainly it is an argument in favor of wood as a medium for as early a period as exact work is advisable. But even so it only emphasizes the necessity of subsequent work where the difference in quality of workmanship requires the exercise of greater discrimination. Does not work in wood to some extent exemplify the inflexibility of the material, and call out from students the type of definiteness in detail characteristic of work in number, while training in the other forms of handwork owes its value more largely to flexibility and is satisfied with definiteness in principles? This meagre consideration of the characteristics of these types of work is, it is realized, most inadequate. The purpose of it is simply to plead for more thoughtful comparative study of the subject. It is not the desire to attempt to discredit in any respect the highly valued training in wood or to...
