Excerpt from The Journal of Nervous and Mental Disease, Vol. 56: An American Journal of Neuropsychiatry Founded in 1874; July December, 1922. Old distinctions, such as those between soma and psyche and between normal and pathological, are breaking down and releasing new interests which are slowly, perhaps, but surely, profoundly changing the way of thinking of psychopathological problems. While this is deeply true, still the outward form of psychiatry, that is, its nosological compartments, remain approximately the same and with very much the same labels. New methods of classification, more especially the mechanistic scheme of Kempf, (1) have not replaced that of Kraepelin. The terminology of Kraepelin continues to hold partly perhaps from inertia, but probably more because his terms present more or less concrete pictures to the mind, and whether those pictures be right or wrong, they are more acceptable than terms which are more abstract and vague, even though perhaps logically and scientifically more sound. The Kraepelinian classification seems to include a greater number of factors that are desirable than any other, and also to make certain concessions to practical needs that indicate that it will hold sway for some time to come. While this is a general statement of the situation, as might be expected, there are certain tendencies which are visible in the literature which are not so simply stated, but which can perhaps best be understood when so backgrounded. In the first place there are those who slavishly follow the Kraepelinian scheme, of course, more particularly where that scheme is most definite, as in the paranoia, manic-depressive, and dementia precox formulations. Bleuler (2) has very well pointed out the danger from such a restricted viewpoint in his criticism...
