The maid of Orleans Friedrich Schiller PREFACE. This translation was begun nearly seventeen years ago, but other pursuits interfered to prevent its completion at that time. An accident recently brought to my remembrance my early attempt, of which I had preserved no copy, and I began to write down as much as I could recollect, supplying vacancies as I proceeded. My aim has been merely to give the spirit of the original, and when I thought that this was gained, I took no great pains to make a strictly literal version. I believe, however, that there are few passages in which I have departed very widely from the original, unless in one or two, which I have purposely altered or omitted. I shall be satisfied, if the friends, for whom alone I have printed this volume, derive from its perusal only a small part of the gratification which I have found in its composition. And with the ancient crown of Dagobert Graces the scion of a foreign stem. The disinherited offspring of our kings In his own kingdom must be fugitive; His nearest cousin and his noblest peer Fights in the armies of his enemy, And his unnatural mother leads them on. Cities and villages are burning round; And to these peaceful and retired vales Still nearer rolls the cloud of desolation. Therefore, dear friends, my careful thoughts are turned Towards my daughters, whilst, with the help of God, I can provide for...
