It is well known that melancholy people, when they are at last convinced that the good they thought impossible has actually happened, are apt to go to extravagant lengths in the opposite direction. They are in an excitable and unstable condition of mind. One who is habitually ready to accept good news can accept it when it comes without losing his balance: while one who has determined beforehand that it is impossible, generally does lose his balance when the impossible has happened. It is altogether unlikely that S. Thomas could have risen suddenly to so tremendous a height of faith as his words express (see further below), and our Lord s answer seems to imply that his words, though indeed they had...
