Excerpt from Railway Rescue: A Letter Addressed to the Directorates of Great Britain IT is the fashion for those who imagine they have something to say on railway subjects, to address themselves to the shareholders, I prefer to speak to you, having come to the conclusion that shareholders are practically an arithmetical nil - a ?uctuating body of sheep-men, here to day and gone to-morrow; now jumping through a hedge-gap into a rich pasture, and anon ? ounding in an impracticable marsh, without the Wit to understand that the pasture of this quarter may be the marsh of next quarter, and vice versa. In short, they merely play the game of follow my leader at the sport of chance. They are a passive and not an active body, buying when shares are up in the market, and selling when they are down. They are in short that nobody, the public, whom all active men, with intellectual faculties alert, and moral facal ties dormant, consider to be their oyster, which they, not with sword, as in the olden time - but with cunning, after modern...
