Not illustrated. 1887 Excerpt: . . . peritonitis developes in consequence of the friction of the cyst against the abdominal walls, the intestines, and uterus, as well as to the changes and inflammations that may take place within the cyst. He has even reported rupture of the cyst and escape of the contents into the abdominal cavity, and some rare cases in which, in consequence of inflammation, cysts have discharged spontaneously, either externally, or into one of the pelvic viscera. Simple cysts are most frequent, and dermoid the next: the latter are most influenced by pregnancy, since, on account of their relatively smaller size, they occupy the true pelvis. The Influence of Cysts on Pregnancy. -- The size of the cyst does not usually have any considerable influence on pregnaney, as long as it is nonadherent, and has a pedicle sufficiently long to allow of its floating freely in the abdomen. If the tumor is small, it nearly always lodges in the posterior cul-de-sac, especially at one side; if not adherent, it rises into the abdomen with the uterus. If, on the contrary, it is a solid growth, and contracts adhesions that keep it within the pelvis, it gives rise to symptoms of incarceration on the part of the uterus, with compression of the bladder and rectum. When the cyst has risen out of the pelvis, it occupies one side of the abdomen, while the uterus occupies the other, so that two distinct tumors are felt on palpation, the character of each being so...
