The waters sent over the Earth, by the melting away of the icebergs, contained in sediment much matter, which was deposited, together with other matter, accumulated in its ragings from mountains, c, upon the Earth, which deposits are now called the diluvial formation. The raging of the waters was terrible. Mountains, that towered towards the heavens in princely grandeur, were reduced to little hills. Hills were converted into mountains. Seas changed their beds, rivers sought new channels, and a wide change was effected in the face of the universe. It must be remembered that the whole Earth was not inundated, but the eastern continent was chiefly the seat of this convulsion of waters. By the melting away of these stupendous icebergs the equilibrium between the internal and external forces was again destroyed. Volcanoes sent forth their fires. Islands were thrown up, and rain, smoke and lava descended upon the Earth in torrents, laying waste to a vast deal of human life. In the short space of five days the equilibrium was reestablished, the waters sought their beds, and Nature began to put forth her energies to repair the injuries done to the face of creation. We have before observed that human life was at this time developed, and hence each nation and tribe has its legend of the flood, all of which differ, and all of which are equally incorrect. Various strata were formed by this...
