Excerpt from Electronic Organization and Expert Networks: Beyond Electronic Mail and Computer Conferencing Under the parent topic for any particular project would usually be a specifications subtopic that key project participants would be able to read but not write into. Task subtopics would normally be such that key participants could write as well as read notes aimed at coordinating their respective efforts in completing such tasks. Outside consultants may be addressed in just those topics where their expertise is needed. Ordinarily, they will not be given access to other topics where proprietary discussions among corporate insiders take place. Project participants need not wait for infrequent meetings in order to coordinate their project actions with those of other team members. Assignments are given and adjusted easily by the project manager online. Information overload is avoided by joining just that combination of topics that relates to responsibilities for achieving project Objectives. Newcomers to any ongoing project get up to speed quickly by reviewing the project s history as detailed online. Depending upon how large a corporation is and how it is organized, electronically...
