CHAPTER XII CONCLUSION If, in conclusion, the questions with which the inquiry began be called to mind they can be briefly answered with reference to the United States. As to the agent of state through whom the power has been exercised, it may be said that in the colonies it was exercised by the colonial governments subject to the regulations and prohibition of Parliament.¹ Under the continental regime the power was exercised only by the states. Under the constitution such power as was believed to be vested in either government was bestowed upon the federal government as distinguished from that of the respective states; and prior to 1862 it was supposed that the power to bestow this quality on bills of credit was withheld from both. That power is now conceded to be likewise vested in Congress. The objects on which the quality has been bestowed have been various: Crude substitutes for coin in the form of articles of use or ornament; coin, domestic and foreign; notes issued by the government, varying in character from true exchequer bills to bills adapted in all respects to monetary purposes; notes issued by institutions chartered under federal law; and, finally, notes issued by institutions owing their existence to commonwealth legislatures. Nor are the reasons which have guided action difficult to state. They have been four in number: (1) The desire to give certainty to contracts drawn in terms of money units was the object of such...
