Excerpt from The Children of the World On the ground ?oor was the sho over which a black sign bore the inscription in gilt letters: oot Shoe Making Done by Gottfried Feyertag. The shoemaker had ordered the large brown boot and red slipper, which had originally been painted on the right and left side, - to be e? aced, because it an noy ed him to see them, when they no longer represented the fash ion. He kept up with the times in his trade, and could not possibly alter his sign at every change of style. The shop, he generally left to the management of his wife he himself spend ing most of the day in the workroom, where he kept a sharp eye on his four or five journeymen. A narrow entry led past the shop into a small, well-kept courtyard, in whose centre stood a tall acacia-tree, three quarters of which had died for want of air and sunlight, so that only its topmost branches were still adorned with a few pale green, consumptive-looking leaves, which every autumn turned yellow some weeks before any oth er foliage. Here, in one corner, beside the pump, an arbor had been erected by the head journeyman, for the daughter of the house, when a school-girl; it consisted of a few small poles roughly nailed together, and now overgrown with bean-vines, which bloomed most dutifully every summer, but in the best years never produced more than a handful of stunted pods. A little bed alon the so - called sunny side of the house con tained all sorts of8 plants that seek the shade, and thrive luxu riantly around cisterns and cellars; and...
