Excerpt: .has been withdrawn, of being considered fully absolved of the crimes which were alleged against her. But this right is now denied her: when no adjudication had been come to upon the bill, it is attempted to visit her with its severest penalties, in the same manner as if she had really been found guilty, and the bill had passed to final adjudication. Thus is she deprived of the advantages of this mode of proceeding which had been vainly promised to her, and especially of this important one--important not only to her Majesty, but to every one who hears me--that a person discharged from all accusation should no longer be considered as guilty (loud applause). When such attempts are making to pervert the result of the proceedings against her, and when further proceedings are meditated, will you sanction such a mockery of justice, and consent...
