Excerpt from Fauna Americana: Being a Description of the Mammiferous Animals Inhabiting North America have engaged in the present undertaking with a full conviction of its absolute necessity, and am very sensible of the difficulties attending the complete attainment of its aim. A work having for its object the illustration of the natural history of our country, cannot fail to prove interesting, and has long been a desideratum to naturalists. However unqualified for the task, I have nevertheless found ample room for additions, alterations and improvements. On the utility of the undertaking it will be unnecessary to insist, when, on referring to the latest authorities who have treated of this subject, we are struck with the confusion, the errors and the deficiencies which still prevail. In the very latest work, Desmarests Mammalogie, published in the year 1820, which professes to describe all the species of Mammalia, hitherto known, the number inhabiting North America, is limited to one hundred species. Of these many are described as uncertain, and his accounts of the manners and habits of most of them, are at best deficient. These remarks are not intended to imply any reflection on the author, whose work is really one of great merit. I have found his synonyms most generally correct, and his descriptions for the most part extremely minute and accurate.
