Excerpt from The Bowdoin Quill, Vol. 3: March, 1899 It is pleasing to note that the watchful care so inaugurated has been followed by the complete preservation of the instrument, the planets still go around as mer rily as of yore. Only squeaking a little on their axes. This does not comprise the list of astronomical apparatus by any means. There were sextants and globes and sun-dials, and all of such an excel lence as to excite our surprise that the college ever managed to possess them. Nor was philosophical apparatus of other sorts wanting. In the first half of the century at least there was ap paratus for performing every then known experiment in electricity and magnetism - batteries large and small, electrical ma chines big and little, and a profusion of accessories of all sorts.
