Excerpt: . . . new to me, that I so much dreaded to ford in the spring of 1827, was also through these same towns and along the trading route that led from them to the river at Graysons Landing, and from thence onward by the way of the Stone Mountain to the Savannah river, keeping all the while within the Indian Territory, (for Georgia and the Creeks were then at war) that Col. Willet soon after escorted the great ambassadorial cavalcade of Creek Chiefs to New York, headed by McGillivray himself, the Sovereign Chief. As I paused for a while on the beautiful overlooking bill that sloped down to the river bank, gazing around and breathing freer, I little thought on what historic ground I was standing, or that the Eastwardly road, the sight of which was still making my heart leap, was only a very modern widening...
