They wore masks, which, acting as sounding-boards, increased the carrying power of their voices. The pleasure of theatre going in ancient Greece, with the blue sky overhead, the pure atmosphere and the natural beauty of the surrounding country, must have been immensely greater than that experienced by the modern theatre goer. Theatres at Athens and Epidaurus. The theatre of Dionysus on the northern slope of the Acropolis of Athens was the most important in Greece (Fig. 73). It is almost a complete ruin. A few choice examples of sculptured decoration have been preserved, together with others of inferior merit that date probably from Roman times. The best preserved theatre in Greece is the one at Epidaurus, the headquarters of the worship of Esculapius, the god of medicine and hygiene. The numerous gymnasia, stoa and gardens to say nothing of the theatre, that formed part of the sacred enclosure, corroborate the testimony of ancient writers as to the sound methods by which the ancient Greeks endeavored both to preserve and to restore their health. Domestic Architecture. The domestic architecture of the Greeks was insignificant and unimportant both to them and to us. The men lived out of doors, in the porticos of the temples, in the agora, the gymnasia, and in the gardens of the philosophers. Their dwelling-houses were small and unpretentious and were merely places in which to eat and sleep. The women of the household led a secluded life therein, debarred, except...
