In reorganizing the work we must recognize that the revised curriculum must be adapted to the needs and interests of the students. Children of elementary school age are all more or less alike in their needs, and they may be offered a prescribed course of training. Whenever the individual enters upon the period of adolescence, however, he begins to look forward to the work of adult life. In other words, his thought and effort tend largely to the vocational. He begins to think of what he wants to do. Economy demands that this tendency shall be recognized in making the curriculum and that the student be allowed to elect within certain limits the courses which suit his interests and needs. However, there should be a certain well-selected group of prescribed studies which he must take along with...
