Excerpt from The Mental Condition Necessary to a Due Inquiry Into Religious Evidence, Stated and Exemplified: In Eight Sermons Preached Before the University of Oxford, in the Year MDCCCXXIII Introduction. Religious evidence is here contemplated through the medium of the reception It experiences. This ground less occupied - important - seasonable. Moral order of the mind implies ascendancy of intellect and conscience. Grosser instances of this order of the mind being broken in upon, and the functions of the intellect in regard to the method and the conduct of religious proof interfered with, by the inferior qualities of the mind under the forms of infidelity, of superstition, of fanaticism. Lesser degrees of it will be here considered. This interference is direct - indirect. Probable proof presents an especial moral trial; and out of the nature of it arise temptations to an ill-governed mind to such interference. Direct interference from within the mind with the method of proof, from sentiment and volition, from fancy and affection; indirect, as veiled under pretences to spiritual means of assurance, or under endeavours after demonstration, in...
