Brand New Book. Excerpt from Francis Philip Nash He had a sound working knowledge of Arabic, Hebrew and Russian, to which within a few years he had annexed Hungarian. From this he had lately translated some clever dramatic Sketches and idylls, for which he had received the hearty acknowledgments and compliments of the authoress. He was never a niggard of the treasures of his Scholarship, but dispensed them without price and with a noble Platonic liberality. It was quite characteristic that, only a month before his death, he spent some labor on translating from the Russian a monograph on the apple-tree moth, which was much needed in connection with the researches of one of the staff of the Agricultural Experiment Station in Geneva. For translating this brochure a prohibitive price had been asked by a Russian Professor in New York City. This little service to a brother in science was characteristic, as I have said; for, time and again, he had spent freely his leisure and learning in revising or recasting manuscript...
