Excerpt from The House of Brocklesby, and Other Poems: Dedicated to the Earl of Yarborough Men? Ages nearer our own time having partly separated the sister arts, music and poetry, and latter years having established music as a science of its own, this may, in some measure, have lowered poetry in the estimation of many; certain it is, a great portion of mankind do not make it their amusement, much more their study, treating it as frivolous and of no utility. On the other hand, it is a great consolation to know, wherever it has been found entitled to merit, and of a religious or good moral tendency, it has been cherished, patronised, admired.
