The 50th meeting of the Munich Security Conference (MSC) was intended as a celebration of sorts. More than 400 movers and shakers attended, including 20 heads of government and 50 foreign and defense ministers as well as numerous legislators. The half-century endurance of the conference attests to the value placed upon it by Americans and Europeans alike. Since the end of the Cold War the MSC has morphed from a purely Transatlantic institution to a global one, with regular participation by Middle Eastern and Asian officials and scholars. And the Russian foreign minister is now a regular participant of this conference which began as the Wehrkunde or Defense Studies meeting to cement Euro-American cohesion against the threat of Soviet aggression. The latter aspect was sorely tested during the 50th conference, which took place at Munich's grand Hotel Bayerischer Hof from 31 January to 2 February of this year. While Viktor Yanukovich still held the presidency in Ukraine and Russian forces had not yet occupied the Crimea, the diplomatic standoff over the domestic crisis in Kiev had clearly begun. It was...
