Come out of your day dream, Janie, and guess what I have for you. Hands behind him, Henry Allen stood looking amusedly down at his daughter. Stretched full length in a gaily striped hammock swung between two great trees, her gray eyes dreamily turned toward the distant mountain peaks, Jane Allen had not heard her father s noiseless approach over the closely clipped green lawn. At sound of his voice, she bobbed up from the hammock with an alacrity that left it swaying wildly. Of course I was dreaming, Dad, she declared gaily, making an ineffectual grab at the hands he held behind him. No fair using force, he warned, dexterously eluding her. This is a guessing contest. Now which hand will you choose? Both hands, you mean thing! laughed Jane. I know what you have in one of them. It s a letter. Maybe two. Now stand and deliver. Here you are. Obliginglly obeying the imperative command, Mr. Allen handed Jane two letters. Oh, joy! Here you are! Jane enveloped her father in a bear-like hug, planting a resounding kiss on his sun-burnt cheek. Having played postman, I suppose my next duty is to take myself off and leave my girl to her letters, was his affectionately smiling comment.
