Have you ever asked yourself questions such as these: Is human existence ultimately an endless race? Do we exist in perpetual competition with everyone else in the global economy? Is this the highest vision of humanity that we can attain? If you are one person in seven billion, can you make any difference at all, or are you so insignificant that your contribution won t count? Is it fundamental human nature to consume natural resources endlessly? Is our species destined to use up this planet eventually? Will the world in 100 years be better or worse than the world today? Most people are aware of the world s dwindling supplies of fossil fuels, fresh water, arable land, and other natural resources. Many people believe that climate change will radically alter our world for the worse. We all understand that we will need to change the way we live, sooner or later, if we are to inhabit this planet indefinitely. The only question is, when? Will our generation change our behavior, or will our children or grandchildren have to deal with...
