Of those who have done this, some have held that the human act can only take place through Divine help; but they have agreed with the others in making all hope wait on the human act, and in rigidly defining what the act must be, in defiance of all differences in understanding, in opportunities, and in points of view. Often the human act, as they have defined it, has been made to involve blindness to the glory of the Divine Presence, and denial of the unchanging care and love. Oh, how they have tormented us in this! As for the initial barrier, our unworthiness, half of what they say would sink us in tribulation over our sin and misery, even if we were not already impressed with it. But they leave us with our helplessness. They do this...
